Alexander Ogorodnik was a Soviet diplomat, a CIA agent codenamed Trianon. In the 1970s he was second secretary of the Soviet Embassy in Bogotá. In Colombia, he was recruited by the CIA under the threat of publishing compromising photographs in which he was depicted with an employee of Columbia University, Pilar Suarez. In December 1974, he returned to Moscow and, worked in the American Department of the Office for Planning Foreign Policy Events of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the USSR.

For two and a half years he was a secret mole of the CIA station in Moscow. Revealed in 1977: counterintelligence witnessed several scenes of "covert operations" involving Ogorodnik and employees of the US Embassy in Victory Park. A Soviet intelligence source in Colombia reported that U.S. intelligence had recruited a Soviet diplomat in Bogota, but all attempts to clarify the rank, position, or at least age of the diplomat were unsuccessful. However, the KGB, taking into account a number of circumstances, began to suspect Ogorodnik and he was placed under surveillance. Ogorodnik's fiancée suspected that he was an American agent. Fearing denunciation, he poisoned his fiancée with poison obtained from the Americans for suicide in case of exposure.

A clandestine search was conducted in Ogorodnik's apartment, during which containers with among other things, photographic films, instructions, and a radio receiver were found. On June 22, 1977, Ogorodnik was arrested at the entrance to his own apartment in House No. 2/1 on Krasnopresnenskaya Embankment. Ogorodnik committed suicide during the arrest, using a capsule with poison hidden in a fountain pen.
